Winifred Black Writes About:

THE KINDNESS OF FATE.

Music—that's all she lived for. Concerts and operas, new songs and old ones.

Singers and accompanists, orchestras and interpretations—these were her daily meat and bread.

She had a sweet high soprano, and a great love of singing—and some day she expected to astonish the world.

And then her father died.

There was no more money and she had to stop taking singing lessons and stop going to concerts and never heard an opera unless some one invited her. And she went to a distant city, and took charge of the music in the public schools, and one day the schoolchildren sang at a great celebration, and she went to lead them.

The orator of the day saw her, and asked to be introduced, and now she is Mrs. Orator, with a lovely home in the country and a neat little apartment in town and all the opera boxes she wants.

Isn't it strange how she used to cry and think the Fates were against her, when she woke up and realized that she was poor and would have to give up her wonderful lessons?

I know a girl who was engaged to be married—and, dear me, how delighted she was!

Her hope chest was crammed to the lid with pretty, fluffy things, and nice, smooth, shining linen.

Her desk was full of letters, love letters and notes and dance programs and souvenirs of this and that.

Heart-Breaking News. She had five photographs of the One Man in the World in her room —one photograph of him sitting down, and one standing up, and one in flannels rowing a boat, and one in flannels serving the ball at a tennis court, and one in golf clothes. And one was in a silver frame and one in a gold frame, and two were framed in wood and one in tortoise shell. And around her neck she wore a silver locket shaped like a heart and in it was a lock of the hair of the One Man in the World. And, just two weeks before the wedding day, some one called her up on the 'phone and told her that the One Man in the World had run away with some one else's wife, and hadn't she better recall the wedding invitations?

We all thought the girl would die—and she did, very nearly, but not quite. And now she is a famous writer, with publishers quarrelling for her books, and she has had at least a dozen chances to marry men a thousand times more interesting and better looking and of more importance than the One Man in the World.

She Wonders Now. She told me the other day that she saw the One Man in the World sitting in the gallery of the theater, when one of her plays was produced. And he was shabby and down in the mouth but very much interested, apparently, in a pretty school-girl who sat across the aisle from him and wondered why he was staring so hard at her.

ing so hard at her.

And the girl who was going to die because the One Man in the World deserted her, says she never would have amounted to a thing if she had married him. And no doubt she's right.

How we do love to plan our lives. And how very little we seem to have to do with them, after all. I don't believe the unanswered prayers are always quite as sad as some of the prayers that are answered too completely.

ADVENTURES OF THE TWINS

by Olive Roberts Barton

In a trice they were sailing earthward under Mr. Sprinkle-Blow's parachute.

When Jack Frost had left the fall; Mark Muskrat can finish his star that the Weatherman lived on, Marty Mink can have his fishing party on the ice without being carried out to sea. Suppose we all go down to the earth ourselves now, and see how things are coming on. I've been so busy up here in the sky getting enough rain barreled up for spring showers, and sunbeams put away for days when Mr. Sun is lazy, and various other things, that really I've had to neglect the earth creatures. You can help me a great deal, I'm sure, being able to understand what they say. And having your Magic Green Shoes is going to be the best help of all, for weather makers like myself are likely to be to go anywhere, you never can tell, and although my umbrella, when open, will float all three of us down to the ground, it is only wrong enough for one when we wish to return here. Yes, your shoes are very valuable."

Mr. Sprinkle-Blow opened his umbrella, then taking Nanny's hand, walked to the edge of the star. "Now my dear, you take Nick's hand and we'll all jump together. One for the money, two for the show, three to make ready, and four to go!"

In a trice they were sailing earthward under Mr. Sprinkle-Blow's old parachute, gently as a feather.
